PROJECT BACKGROUND

Dox Thrash was a distinguished African American artist, and an important figure in the history of printmaking. Thrash purchased the three-story brick structure located at 2340 Cecil B. Moore Avenue (North Philadelphia) in 1944. He is most widely recognized as the creator of the printmaking process called carborundum. Thrash's discovery of the carborundum print process was hailed at the time as "one of the most important developments in the technique of fine print reproduction." Thrash has also been credited for raising awareness of the African American female nude, which prior to the 1970s had been virtually absent within American art. Since Thrash's death, his artwork has gained appreciation from art historians, culminating in a retrospective at the Philadelphia Museum of Art in 2001.

Building & Site

The parcel is a row house at 2340 Cecil B. Moore Avenue. The remaining structure consists of a 3-story brick façade wall and partial side-bearing wall with internal wood bracing to support the structure that front along Cecil B. Moore Avenue. Given the location of the property along Cecil B. Moore and its proximity to other neighborhood assets such as the library and recreation center, the site is poised to become an anchor for the community.

Beech Community Services development forecast includes a commercial space on the first floor. The 2nd & 3rd floors will be residential lofts studios / living space.

The goal is to redevelop the structure because of its historical value to the community: both residential and artist.

Key factors include:

- the building was the home of Dox Thrash, a black Philadelphia artist and businessman.
- the architecture represents a unique style.
- the role the building can have in the revitalization of the Cecil B Moore Avenue Commercial Corridor
